

UNCATEGORIZED

INDEPENDENT SCIENCE

15.12.2008

The Lancet of Dec 6, 2008 shows an excellent example of independent science (and in particular public health research) and gives an account why this is necessary although I agree with the author

I am sure that Coca-Cola will find other universities eager to pluck the low-hanging fruit of industry-sponsored research. If my experience is anything to go by, not much plucking will be necessary. A research proposal will be written for them and a research grant will be plopped into the open mouths of their university's finance department while their academic egos are stroked by the company's scientists. What a sad abuse of the rare freedom granted to publicly funded academics to seek answers to socially important questions.

And what a nice coincidence with a paper in Nature Medicine about the commercialism of academic research plus some earlier posts here, yea, yea.

CC-BY-NC Science Surf accessed 15.02.2026 